Over the next few days, as you spend time on campus, you will have the opportunity to glimpse the transformative power of Harvard College that our students experience each and every day. The opportunity to visit classes and engage in discussions with faculty members will offer you a sense of where the intellectual transformation begins for our students.

At the same time, the many open houses, receptions and the Harvard football game will give you a chance to see how the College community comes together in ways that support the social transformation of our students. And finally, we hope that your time on campus meeting your student's peers and their families will open a window to the rich diversity of experiences and perspectives that contribute to the personal transformation for our students. According to the United States National Institute of Mental Health and Canada's Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, approximately 20 percent of adults in the United States and Canada live with a mental illness. And yet the biases and misperceptions surrounding mental illness remain pervasive, destructive, and at times deadly. At particular risk are individuals already marginalized by society because of their ethnicity, race, immigration status, gender, sexuality, socioeconomic status and other factors. In this open class, we'll be discussing these dynamics as they relate to the mental wellbeing of Black women in the United States and Indigenous women in Canada, focusing on Meri Nana-Ama Danquah's memoir Willow Weep for Me: A Black Woman's Journey through Depression and Terese Marie Mailhot's memoir Heart Berries as challenges to conventional understandings of mental illness.
